Passage 1

Comprehensive lifestyle changes including a better diet and more exercise can lead not only to a better physique, but also to swift and dramatic changes at the genetic level. In a small study, the researchers tracked 30 men with low-risk prostate cancer who decided against conventional medical treatment, such as surgery and radiation or hormone therapy.

The men underwent three months of major lifestyle changes, including eating a diet rich in fruits, vegetables, whole grains, and soy products, moderate exercise such as walking for half an hour a day, and an hour of daily stress management methods such as meditation. As expected, they lost weight, lowered their blood pressure, and saw other health improvements. But the researchers found more profound changes when they compared prostate biopsies taken before and after the lifestyle changes. After the three months, the men had changes in activity in about 500 genes—including 48 that were turned on and 453 genes that were turned off. The activity of disease-preventing genes increased, while a number of diseases prompting genes, including those involved in prostate cancer, shut down.

The research was led by a university professor who was also a well-known author advocating lifestyle changes to improve health “It’s an exciting finding because so often people say, ‘Oh it is all in my genes, what can I do?’ Well it turns out you may be able to do a lot. “The author mentioned in a telephone interview” in just three months, I can change hundreds of my genes simply by changing what I eat and how I live. “And that’s very exciting, he said. The implications of our study are not only limited to men with prostate cancer.”

66. In total, how many genes changed as a result of the healthy lifestyle?

Passage 2

Studies are quite unanimous on this issue: Drivers of expensive cars are the worst. A new study has found that drivers of expensive vehicles are less likely to stop and allow pedestrians to cross the road- with the likelihood they'll slow down, decreasing by 3% for every extra $1,000 that their vehicle is worth.

Researchers speculated that the expensive car owners "felt a sense of superiority over other road users" and were less able to empathize with sidewalk-dwellers. They came to this conclusion after asking volunteers to cross a sidewalk hundreds of times, filming and analyzing the responses by car drivers.

Researchers used one white and one black man, and one white and one black woman. They found that costly cars were more likely to yield for the white and female participants. Vehicles stopped 31% of the time for both women and white participants, compared with 24% of the time for men and 25% of the time for black volunteers.

But the best predictor of whether a car would stop was its price, researchers discovered. They also theorized "Disengagement and a lower ability to interpret thoughts and feelings of others along with feelings of entitlement may lead to a lack of empathy for pedestrians" among costly car drivers.

And the discovery of a car-value to inconsiderate driving-behavior correlation isn't new. The research, backed up a Finnish study recently published that found drivers of costly vehicles are more likely to be "argumentative, stubborn and disagreeable."

According to that survey of 1,892 drivers by the University of Helsinki, those deemed to have more disagreeable character traits were among the drivers of expensive automobiles. However, it also found that conscientious people often favor higher-priced vehicles

76. In paragraph 2, line 3, "they" refers to .....

- |                      |                |
|----------------------|----------------|
| 1) sidewalk dwellers | 2) researchers |
| 3) road users        | 4) volunteers  |

77. In paragraph 5, line 2, "backed up" is a near synonym for .....

- |              |                 |
|--------------|-----------------|
| 1) refuted   | 2) contradicted |
| 3) supported | 4) countered    |

78. The most suitable title for the passage is .....

- 1) Empathy of costly car drivers
- 2) Character traits of most drivers in expensive automobiles
- 3) Sense of superiority over road users
- 4) Expensive cars do not have pleasant characters

79. According to the research mentioned in this passage, drivers of expensive cars .....

- 1) respected pedestrians as much as the other drivers did
- 2) did not often stop for pedestrians
- 3) often yelled at pedestrians from their cars
- 4) expected pedestrians to let them move ahead

80. The research found that .....

- 1) drivers stopped more often for white pedestrians.
- 2) black pedestrians slowed down more often for expensive cars.
- 3) race was not a significant factor in this study.
- 4) drivers stopped more often for black men than for women.

81. The Finish study published recently .....

- 1) looked at how often pedestrians stopped for drivers.
- 2) was funded by the conscientious people of Helsinki.
- 3) analyzed the personality traits of expensive car drivers.
